Their average diameter is 0.01 mm. ($\frac{1}{80}$ inch). In normal blood several forms are distinguished: lymphocytes, large uni-nuclear leukocytes, transitional forms, and multi-nuclear cells; according to the granules contained in their protoplasm, three varieties are described—the neutrophil, the eosinophil, and the basophil. 1.s., Ehrlich's theory concerning, all varieties may be classed into two groups having separate origins, functions, and relations. The first group would comprise all lymphocytes, which are produced solely by the lymphatic tissues; and the second, the mono-nuclear leukocytes and transitional forms, the polynuclear neutrophils, the eosinophils, and the basophils, all of which cells are produced exclusively by the marrow. 1., polymorphonucleic, 1., polynuclearneutrophilic, one derived primarily from lymphocytes and secondarily from a myelocyte; originating in red bone-marrow, in the lymph-glands, or spleen. 1.s., polymorphous, 1.s., polynuclear, cells

The paroxysms may be intermittent, remittent, or irregular. If repeated daily, the fever is designated quotidian; if on alternate days, tertian; if with an interval of two days, quartan. If two paroxysms occur daily, the fever is designated a double quotidian. There may be a tertian form, a paroxysm occurring daily, but only those of alternate days being alike; a double quartan form, and others. A typical malarial paroxysm consists of a cold stage, a hot stage, and a sweating stage, occurring in the sequence given. Intermittent fever is characterized by the occurrence of a complete intermission of the symptoms in the interval between two paroxysms, the temperature becoming normal or subnormal. In remittent fever there is only an amelioration of the symptoms in the intervals. In certain localities in which the malarial organisms are exceedingly numerous or intensely virulent the attack displays a pernicious tendency. Of this type there may be a cerebral form, characterized either by delirium and excitement or by coma and depression; a thoracic form, in which the respiration is accelerated and there is an urgent sense of the need of air; a gastrointestinal form, attended with nausea, vomiting, jaundice, and diarrhea; or an asthenic or algid form, in which there is a condition of marked debility with a striking coldness of the surface and of the breath. To the irregular manifestations of malarial poisoning, which do not at any time present the classic association of chill, fever, and sweat, the designation of "dumb ague" is given. The enlargement of the spleen in chronic malaria is sometimes designated "ague-cake." Syn., marsh-fever. m. hematuria, the presence of blood in the urine as a result of malarial poisoning. m. neuralgia, neuralgia due to malarial intoxication.

200; quantivalence II. Hydrargyrum. A shining, silver-white, liquid, volatile metal, having a specific gravity of 13.55. It is insoluble in the ordinary solvents, in hydrochloric acid, and in sulphuric acid in the cold; it dissolves in the last when boiled with it, and is readily soluble in nitric acid. It boils at 357.25°C ., and solidifies at -39.4°C . Mercury is found pure, but is chiefly obtained as the native sulphide, or cinnabar. Pertaining to the system of weights and measures, of which the meter is the basis. m. system, a decimal system of weights and measures employed in France, Germany, and other countries, and used generally in the sciences. The standard is the meter, the ten-millionth part of the distance from the equator to the north pole. The actual standard unit is the distance between two lines on a platinum-iridium rod preserved in the archives of the International Metric Commission at Paris, and is equivalent to 39.37079 inches; in the United States the length of the meter is assumed as 39.37 inches. The standard of capacity is the liter, a cubic volume $\frac{1}{10}$ meter in each dimension. The standard of weight is the gram, the weight of $\frac{1}{1000}$ liter (one cubic centimeter) of distilled water at its maximum density. As the unit of microscopic measurement the thousandth part of a millimeter has been adopted. It is called micromillimeter, or micron; its symbol is μ . The multiples in the metric system are expressed by the prefixes deca-, hecto-, and kilo-; the subdivisions by the prefixes deci-, centi-, and milli-.

1000	meters	= 1 kilometer
100	meters	= 1 hectometer.
10	meters	= 1 decameter.
.1	meter	= 1 decimeter.
.01	meter	= 1 centimeter.

10	grams	= 1 decagram.
.1	gram	= 1 decigram.
.01	gram	= 1 centigram.
.001	gram	= 1 milligram.

In common practice, however, the following divisions only are used, the others being expressed in figures:

10 millimeters	= 1 centimeter.
100 centimeters	= 1 meter.
1000 meters	= 1 kilometer.

1000 cubic centimeters = 1 liter.

1000 milligrams	= 1 gram.
1000 grams	= 1 kilogram.

The following are the equivalent values:

Having well-developed muscles. m. anesthesia, a lack of the muscular sense. m. reflex, a deep or tendon reflex. m. rheumatism, rheumatism affecting the muscles. m. sense, the sense of motion, weight, and position upon which the adjustment of the body to its surroundings depends. m. system, the muscles of the body taken together. m. tissue, the tissue of which muscles are composed; it is of two principal varieties—the striped, striated, or voluntary, and the unstriped, nonstriated, or involuntary muscular tissue. The striped muscular tissue is composed of muscle-fibers, the unstriped of elongated, spindle-shaped cells. A muscle-fiber consists of sarcolemma, muscle-nuclei, and muscle-substance. The sarcolemma is an elastic, homogeneous, connective-tissue sheath which lightly invests the muscle-fiber. The nuclei are fusiform in shape, are situated immediately beneath the sarcolemma, and run parallel with the axis of the fiber. The muscle-fiber itself consists of two substances—a dark, doubly refracting, or anisotropic contractile substance, and a lighter, semifluid, isotropic substance termed sarcoplasm. The contractile substance consists of delicate spindles, the apposition of the thicker portions of which produces the dark transverse disc. The spindles terminate in minute beads, the juxtaposition of which gives rise to the intermediate disc or membrane of Krause. The neutral sarcoplasm fills out the spaces left between the spindles, and, as ordinarily the tapering ends of the spindles are too delicate to be seen, the space between the intermediate and transverse discs—the lateral disc—looks homogeneous. The contractile fibrils into which the contractile substance is divided, formed by the end-to-end union of the spindles, are aggregated into bundles—the muscle-columns—surrounded by a layer of sarcolemma. On transverse section these muscle-columns give rise to the appearance known as Cohnheim's fields. The muscle-fibers are held together by delicate areolar tissue—the endomysium. Several grouped together form a primary bundle, which is surrounded by a sheath termed the perimysium. Fasciculi are aggregations of primary bundles, and are the units of which the complete muscle is composed, the latter being surrounded by the epimysium. m.-tone. See muscle-tonus. m. tumor. See myoma.

The axis-cylinder (Deiters') process either becomes an axis-cylinder of a nerve-fiber, or divides within the gray matter into delicate filaments; it gives off minute branches termed collaterals; the other processes are supposed to have nutritive and conducting functions. n-center, a group of nerve-cells acting together in the performance of a function. n., centrifugal. A typical medullated fiber consists of the axis-cylinder, which may be surrounded by a sheath, the axilemma; the medullary sheath, or white substance of Schwann; the neurilemma, or sheath of Schwann. The inspissated juice obtained by incising the unripe capsules of Papaver somniferum, of the order Papaveraceae, occurring in commerce in the form of brownish cakes having a narcotic odor and a bitter taste. Other alkaloids are narcotine, $C_{17}H_{23}NO_7$, codeine, $C_{18}H_{21}NO_4$, thebaine or paramorphine, $C_{19}H_{21}NO_4$, papaverine, $C_{20}H_{27}NO_4$, narceine, $C_{21}H_{23}NO_4$, pseudomorphine, $C_{20}H_{25}NO_4$, and laudanine, $C_{20}H_{25}NO_4$. These bases occur in opium combined with meconic and thebolactic acids. According to the U. S. P., moist opium should contain not less than 9% of crystallized morphine. Opium acts as a narcotic, producing deep sleep, which, however, is often preceded by a stage of mental excitement and exhilaration; on awakening there may be headache, nausea, or vomiting. It slows the pulse and increases its force and raises blood-pressure; small doses do not depress the respiration, but large doses do so in a marked degree. It checks the motor activity of the stomach and intestine, and lessens all secretions except that of the skin; it produces contraction of the pupil. When taken in poisonous doses it causes unconquerable drowsiness, passing into deep sleep, with slow, full respiration, slow pulse, and contracted pupils; later cyanosis develops, the respiration becomes exceedingly slow, and the pulse rapid and feeble; death takes place from failure of the respiration. See poisons, table of. There is a chronic form of opium-poisoning produced by the habitual use of opium or morphine, and characterized by mental depression, a deterioration of the moral sense, and attacks of diarrhea. The disease usually begins in the muscles of the calf, and spreads over the body, the muscles of the hand almost always escaping. There are marked lordosis and a peculiar gait, with wide separation of the legs and swaying of the body from side to side. The characteristic symptom is the manner in which the patient arises from the floor—he "climbs" up on his legs, on account of the weakened state of the extensor muscles of the back. It is most common in young male children. The disease is entirely myopathic, no adequate nerve-lesion having as yet been discovered. The muscles are the seat of hypertrophy and atrophy of muscular fibers, hyperplasia of the connective tissue, and fatty infiltration. p., reflex, the paralysis sometimes following immediately upon a wound of a nerve, or the paraplegia sometimes due to irritation of an adherent prepuce. Certain deviations from this law constitute the reaction of degeneration. The law may be briefly stated as follows:

Strength of Current Used.	Descending Current.		Ascending Current.
	Make.	Break.	Make.	Break.
Very Weak	Yes.	No.	No.	No.
Weak	Yes.	No.	Yes.	No.
Moderate	Yes.	Yes.	Yes.	Yes.
Strong	Yes.	No.	No.	Yes.

P.'s law of reflex action. 1. If stimulation of a sensory nerve is followed by a unilateral reflex movement, the latter always occurs on the side to which the sensory nerve belongs. 2. If the stimulus received by a sensory nerve extends, to motor nerves of the opposite side, contraction occurs only in the corresponding muscles. 3. If the contraction is unequal on the two sides, the stronger contraction always takes place on the side which is stimulated. 4. If the reflex excitement extends to other motor nerves, the direction of the impulse from the sensory to the motor nerve is from before backward in the brain and from below upward in the spinal cord—i.e., always in the direction of the oblongata. P.'s tubes, ovarian tubes; sac-ciform or tubular ingrowths of the germ epithelium on the anterointernal surface of the Wolffian body; they ultimately form the cortex of the ovary.

pleurisy (ploo'-ris-e) [pleura]. Pleuritis; inflammation of the pleura. It may be acute or chronic. Three chief varieties are usually described, depending upon the character of the exudate: (1) Fibrinous or plastic; (2) serofibrinous; (3) purulent. In fibrinous pleurisy the pleura is covered with a layer of lymph of variable thickness, which, in the acute form, can be readily stripped off. Serofibrinous pleurisy is characterized by the presence of a considerable quantity of fluid containing floculi of lymph, and the deposit of some fibrin on the pleural surface. Purulent pleurisy, or empyema, is characterized by the presence of a purulent exudate. Acute pleurisy is marked by sharp and stabbing pain (stitch) in the side, increased by breathing and coughing; by fever, and by a friction-fremitus felt on palpation and a to-and-fro friction-sound heard on auscultation. In the serofibrinous variety a liquid effusion takes place, the signs of which are: bulging of the intercostal spaces and chest-wall, absence of vocal fremitus, displacement of the heart, movable dullness with a curved upper line, and a tympanitic percussion-note (Skodaic resonance) beneath the clavicle and above the level of the effusion. Chronic pleurisy may be dry or serofibrinous. p., diaphragmatic, that restricted to the pleural surface of the diaphragm. p., dry, that attended with little or no effusion of fluid. p., encysted, pleurisy in which the effusion is circumscribed by adhesions. p., false, pleurodynia. p., fetid, that marked by the presence of fetid fluid. p., hemorrhagic, a variety in which the exudate contains blood. p., humid, p., moist, that accompanied by expectoration. p., ichorous. They increase the brightness of an electric spark or the luminosity of phosphorescent bodies; they are emitted by the Roentgen-ray tube, by an Auer-Welsbach incandescent gas-mantle, by the ordinary gas-flame, but not by a Bunsen burner; the sun emits these in abundance, as does the Nernst lamp. Compression, torsion, and strain of many solids will cause the emission of the rays; living bodies, plants, and animals emit them. r.s., Niewenglowski's, certain luminous rays emitted from phosphorescent substances which may pass through opaque screens and affect sensitive plates. Niewenglowski was probably the first to establish the existence of such rays. r.s., photographic. A vacuum-tube of glass (called a Geissler tube, a Hittorf or a Crookes tube) is used with two wires sealed through the glass. These wires are connected with the two poles of a battery, and Roentgen found that the rays from the kathode (kathode rays) had peculiar penetrative powers through matter opaque to other ether-rays, and that by means of these rays photographs ("shadowgrams") may be taken of bones, metallic substances, etc., situated in the tissues; they readily traverse living tissues and influence the nutrition of the deeper ones; they have no appreciable effect on the vitality of bacteria. Hertz, and especially Lenard, prior to Roentgen, had discovered this penetrating power of the cathode rays, but failed to make the application suggested by Roentgen. r.s., S of Sagnac, secondary rays emanating from metals on which Roentgen rays fall and distinguish from the primary rays irregularly refracted by difference in character, not being nearly so penetrating; the lighter the metal struck by the primary rays, the more penetrating the secondary rays. r.s., soft, rays coming from a tube the pressure in which is fairly low; they are readily absorbed. Cf. r.s., hard. r.s., ultraviolet, waves of the luminiferous ether which do not affect the retina. They can be reflected, refracted, and polarized; they will not traverse many bodies that are pervious to the rays of the visible spectrum; they produce photographic and photochemical effects, and destroy rapidly the vitality of bacteria. Syn., actinic rays; photographic rays. r.s., uranium. See r.s., Becquerel. r.s., X-. See r.s., Roentgen.

tuberculosis (tū-ber'-kū-lo'-sis) [tubercle]. An infectious disease due to Bacillus tuberculosis, discovered by Koch. The lesion produced by the growth of the bacillus is the tubercle (miliary or gray tubercle or nodule), a small, grayish, translucent nodule, from $\frac{1}{8}$ to 2 mm. in diameter, firmly embedded in the surrounding tissues. By the coalescence of neighboring tubercles large masses, the so-called tuberculous infiltrations, are produced. The tendency of tuberculous lesions is to undergo cheesy necrosis. For this degeneration two factors are responsible: the absence of blood-vessels and the action of peculiar poisons elaborated by the bacillus. The breaking down of tuberculous areas in the interior of organs gives rise to cavities, which may be seen in muscles, bones, brain, lymphatic glands, and elsewhere, but are most pronounced in the lungs. On surfaces—skin and mucous membranes—tuberculosis often leads to the formation of ulcers. The most frequent seats of tuberculosis are the lung, the intestinal tract, the lymphatic glands, the serous membranes, the bones, the skin, the testicle, the epididymis, the brain, the Fallopian tubes, the uterus, the spleen. The symptoms of tuberculosis vary with the localization of the disease. A few general phenomena are common to nearly all forms, viz., emaciation, loss of strength, anemia, fever, and sweats. t., acute miliary, an acute febrile disease, characterized by the formation of minute tubercles in great numbers in various parts of the body. t. fever, enteric fever, abdominal typhus, ileotyphus.

An infectious disease caused by Bacillus typhosus discovered by Eberth. It is introduced into the body with the food and drinking-water, and is found in the intestine, the spleen, and the fecal discharges, but may also occur in the various complicating lesions. The principal lesions of typhoid fever are an enlargement and necrosis of Peyer's patches, and enlargement of the spleen and the mesenteric glands. The mucous membrane of the intestine is also the seat of a catarrhal inflammation. After a period of incubation of from two to three weeks the disease sets in with weakness, headache, vague pains, a tendency to diarrhea, and nose-bleed. The temperature gradually rises, being higher each evening than the previous evening, and reaches its maximum (104°-105° F.) in from one to two weeks. It then remains at this level for from one to two weeks, and finally sinks by lysis. The pulse is soft and dicrotic, but often not so rapid as would be expected from the high temperature. The tongue is at first coated on the dorsum and red at the tip and edges, but soon becomes dry, brown, and tremulous, and, like the teeth and lips, covered with sordes. There is usually complete anorexia, the bowels are loose, and the stools have a peculiar "pea-soup" color. At times constipation exists. Slight congestion of the lungs with cough is usually present. On the seventh, eighth, or ninth day the peculiar eruption appears—it consists of small, slightly elevated, rose-colored spots, disappearing on pressure, and coming out in successive crops. Nervous symptoms are prominent in typhoid fever, and are headache, slight deafness, stupor, muttering delirium, carphology, subsultus tendinum, and coma vigil. Complications are frequent, the most important being intestinal hemorrhage, perforation of the bowel, peritonitis, pneumonia, and nephritis. Relapses are fairly common, although second attacks are rare. t. state, the condition of stupor and hebetude, with dry, brown tongue, sordes on the teeth, rapid, feeble pulse, incontinence of feces and urine, and rapid wasting, seen in typhoid fever and other continued fevers. t. vaccination, vaccination against typhoid; see vaccination (2). t., walking, see t., ambulatory.

The only peculiar lesions noted postmortem are a dark fluid state of the blood and a staining of the endocardium and intima of the blood-vessels. T disease is caused by the Bacillus typhi exanthematici (Plotz). After a period of incubation of from a few hours to two weeks, the disease sets in abruptly with pains in the head, back, and limbs, the fever rising rapidly to 104° or 105° F. The nervous symptoms resemble those of typhoid fever. The eruption appears on the fourth or fifth day as rose-colored spots scattered over all the body, and quickly becoming hemorrhagic. It does not disappear on pressure. The chief complications are hyperpyrexia, pneumonia and nephritis. Different amounts of the inactivated rabbit serum are added to the tubes, beginning with 0.01 Cc. to 0.1 Cc. The tubes are then incubated one hour. That in which complete hemolysis occurs contains just enough amboceptor to dissolve 1 Cc. of 5 % emulsion of sheep red-cells. Double this quantity is the amboceptor to be used. Suspected serum to be examined is drawn from a superficial vein with a glass syringe under strict aseptic precautions, 5 to 10 Cc. of blood being desirable, but 1 to 2 Cc. suffices. Clear in a centrifuge, then inactivate by heat for thirty minutes at 56° C. Will keep in ice-box for weeks. Test.—Put 1 Cc. of complement, 2 drops of suspected serum, about 0.1 Cc. of antigen in test-tube and incubate one hour at 37° C. Then add the amount of amboceptor, determined by standardization, and 1 Cc. of 5 % emulsion of sheep's red-cells suspended in normal salt solution and incubate again for one hour. Then place in ice-box for six hours. Complete hemolysis is indicated by a clear, burgundy-red solution, showing no precipitate. No hemolysis, by a solid opaque sediment of the unaffected sheep cells at the bottom of the tube, while the supernatant fluid is clear and colorless. Result: Hemolysis, no syphilis; syphilis, no hemolysis.
